According to Christianity, the ‘good news’ (i.e. the Gospel) is that individuals are saved by grace through faith in Christ; and the way to salvation is through Christ alone. What’s more, it is often alleged that those who do not accept the gift of salvation face eternal damnation. But in order for people to be able to accept this gift, the Gospel must be proclaimed to them. However, there have been various, incompatible versions of the Gospel that have been declared bona fide by different authorities throughout history. Why then, would a God – who offers salvation – allow for competing versions of the Gospel to be proclaimed, when so much is potentially at stake?
